Our National Aims and Ideals Defined by the President

The interesting and inspiring thing about America is that she asks nothing for herself except what she has a right to ask for humanity itself.

We want no nation's property; we wish to question no nation's honor; we wish to stand selfishly in the way of the development of no nation; we want nothing that we cannot get by our own legitimate enterprise and by the inspiration of our example, and, standing for these things, it is not pretension on our part to say that we are privileged to stand for what every nation would wish to stand for, and speak for those things which all humanity must desire.

The navy of the United States is a body specially trusted with the idea of America. These quiet ships lying in the river have no suggestion of bluster about them, no intimation of aggression. They are commanded by men thoughtful of the duty of citizens as well as the duty of officers-men who know what sort of purposes they ought to entertain and what sort of discretion they ought to exercise in order to use those engines of force as engines to promote the interests of humanity.

The strength of our polity is that we who for the time being administer the affairs of this nation do not originate her spirit; we attempt to embody it; we attempt to realize it in action; we are dominated by it, we do not dictate it. And so with every man in arms who serves the nation-he stands and waits to do the thing which the nation desires.

When a crisis occurs in this country, gentlemen, it is as if you put your hand on the pulse of a dynamo; it is as if these things which you were in connection with were spiritually bred. You had nothing to do with them, except if you listen truly to speak the things that you hear.

No threat lifted against any man, against any nation, against any interest, but just a great, solemn evidence that the force of America is the force of moral principle, that there is not anything else that she loves, and that there is not anything else for which she will contend.
